In the slaughterhouses of McDonald's U.S. chicken suppliers, birds are dumped out of their transport crates and hung upside-down by their feet in metal shackles, which often results in broken bones, extreme bruising, and hemorrhaging. Workers have ample opportunity to abuse the live birds, who also have their throats cut while they are still conscious. Many of them are even immersed in tanks of scalding-hot water while they are still alive and able to feel pain.

There is a less cruel method of slaughter available today that would eliminate these abuses, yet McDonald's refuses to require its U.S. suppliers to switch to it.
